精読 p.66 全文を和訳せよ。

To many English people, railways are more than just a means of transportation. They are even objects of affection. There are clubs and societies whose members share a common interest in railway, and making models of trains is not an uncommon. Many boys catch this "railway fever", and spend hours sitting in railway stations "train spotting".

Most animals tend to increase faster than the available food supply, so that there is a constant struggle for existence. Those that survived must have some advantage over those that perished, making them better adapted to their environment. Hence only the fittest survived and lived to produce offspring with the same characteristics. This, nature's way of choosing, Darwin called the principle of natural selection.